To understand the impact of Said Ahmed, it is essential to contextualize the Uzbek literary tradition within the broader socio-political environment of the early 20th century. The Russian Revolution of 1917, followed by the establishment of Soviet power, brought about a myriad of changes to the cultural fabric of Central Asia. The period was marked by a significant push towards modernity, which included a concerted effort to promote literacy, develop a standard language, and encourage the expression of national identity through literature.
